A grateful young woman prayed to the god of time with an hourglass, asking protection from the hunter that was hunting her. This time the god responded with a yes, as long as she took care of his son, that was in that hourglass for two months and then he would grant her the protection she needed. Two months later she was in the village getting produce to make a soup, when she saw the hunter. He started sprinting at her. Her heart ached as she ran home. Her body was shaking with fear, knees were weak, as she sprinted through her door, not stopping, grabbing the hourglass and a scarf on her way out the back door. She tied one side of the scarf to the top of the hourglass and secured the other side of it to herself. She climbed onto her roof. The hunter was right behind her. As she jumped from building to building, she came to the end of the village when she saw that she was in an open area. She had to find a way to hide. Her father whispered in her ear, "To disappear from thin air you have to have a blank mind."

The hunter had an arrow pointing to her chest and soon he was going to release the arrow from his grip. She thought that she was the one who stopped the arrow in midair. This was not near the truth. It was the son of the time god. He wasn't a baby but a man in his twenties.

He shifted the time to stop the arrow from hitting the woman. He shifted the time back and caught the arrow with his right hand, broke it, looking the hunter dead in the eyes.
